Blueridge a place to raise families

The same elements that attracted people to settle in Blueridge in the beginning of its development continue to attract people there today. These sentiments have essentially not changed since '58 and '60 when development began. Blueridge/Seymour Heights was a bedroom community of Vancouver and was ready to be developed as such with the final construction of the new Second Narrows (Iron Workers Memorial) Bridge in 1958. It was a quiet, family-oriented neighbourhood with few facilities and no town centre. When the Second Narrows was completed in 1958, a general sentiment regarding the development of Blueridge at the time was, "Why would you want to live way out there?" Blueridge would have seemed like living at the end of the line.

The theme of a quiet bedroom community continues to this day. Blueridge did attract, and continues to attract, families with young children. Marnie Armstrong grew up in the area in the 60s and returned to raise her own family. Quiet streets, neighbourly neighbours and no noisy commercial area are features that are the hallmark of the community.

The few businesses that did exist at the time were located along Keith Road, which would later become Mount Seymour Parkway. At the corner of Parkway and Emerson Street was the Mount Seymour Store, more commonly known as Fay's. There was the United Church and a community hall. These were the only commercial enterprises in the area, save for

President's Message

The Deep Cove Heritage Society is looking forward to a busy summer. In the plans are a hike to Quarry Rock in Deep Cove, a visit to Wild Bird Trust's Corrigan Nature House in the Maplewood Flats and a boat cruise up Indian Arm. We are also expanding our website with interesting documents that have been acquired over the years. We appreciate your interest and support.

Sincerely, Tom Kirk,
President

— in the early years — Butterfield's chicken farm, a turkey farm, and Savaglia's orchard (at Berkley Road and Swinburne). For the most part, the residents were not interested in having any more of a retail/commercial element other than these basic facilities. At a later time, when a grocery store venture was proposed, some neighbours put together a petition to prevent it. The residents were not eager to have places where teenagers would hang out. The Community Hall held community dances, offered dance lessons and ran a parent participation preschool. For large grocery shops, Isobel Peters remembers heading to the Woodward's Food Floor in Park Royal with the whole family on a Friday night.

In 1958, as development began, the roads were yet unpaved. Many areas in Blueridge had to be drained as the land was wet and swampy in parts. The original lots cost anywhere from $3,000.00 to $4,000.00.

The clearing of the land was often done by the owners, hand clearing the lots, digging out stumps and then, with permits, burning brush and stumps. Mr.

Thorpe hired Squamish Nation men to help him do his land clearing. Some owners built or oversaw the building of their own houses. Removing stumps and clearing land was sometimes done using horses to haul out the trees and stumps. Alf Cockle obtained a burning permit and had a large fire that brought out the neighbour next door to investigate.

The Crosbys, who lived up on Berkley Road past Sechelt, in the early days kept a horse in their back yard which backed up to green space. Alf Cockle also recalls that early on the roads developed huge potholes, some "that were big enough to hold a VW bug." In later expansion of Blueridge going north, old vehicles that had been caught in mud and buried were later excavated with the new construction.

Growing up in Blueridge in those early years was a classic 1960s childhood. Before Blueridge School was built, there were ponds with frogs and tadpoles to catch. Kids played in the woods and went home only when they heard their mothers calling them from the front porch, letting them know that lunch was ready. If not roaming in the woods, kids might pass by a trailer on a property located in the vicinity of Carnation and Berkley where a woman lived alone. For the kids, it was like a dare, to knock on her door and collect the caramels that she would hand out.

Buses came to the community in 1972 and prior to that one would have to walk down to Mount Seymour Parkway where there was a bus to Vancouver in the morning, with a return run in the evening.

And what did the parents busy themselves with besides raising families? Some of them were busy being entrepreneurs; Sandra Wilson created Robeez Shoes. There were well-known personalities, Don Williams and Mike McCardle amongst them. During the daytime, the women of the area would gather for political meetings over coffee and local politicians would attend. The living room was filled with neighbours at Hazel Simpson's house, one neighbour recalls. Politicians in the area included Jack Davis, Gordon Gibson, Robina Jaffer, Brian Gardiner, Naomi Yamamoto and others.

Blueridge was a place where neighbours were neighbours in a traditional sense. Marnie Armstrong remembers when she was about six years old, the

Wadells, on Bronte

Street, had their elderly parents visit. Grandpa Wadell got sick and vomited in the toilet, unfortunately losing his dentures to the plumbing. The whole neighbourhood got together to help, pulling the manhole cover off the street septic system, climbing down and somehow managing to retrieve the expensive dentures.

Gretchen Mostardi recalls the time the Andersons had a big party and woke up to find a strange teenage girl sleeping on their sofa — she had mistaken the house for her own whilst wandering home in the wee hours of the morning.

Blueridge is all about community. To this day, it celebrates an annual Community Days event. Blueridge continues to maintain its family feel, much as it always has and follows the original District plan goal, "Harmony with Nature"; the access to biking and hiking trails continues to draw in outdoor enthusiasts to explore the foot of Mount Seymour. New families moving into the area are tending to renovate homes, not tearing them down to rebuild. As a result, the character of the community remains the same. Eric Anderson refers to Blueridge as "a cul-de-sac community." "It makes it safer when you know your neighbours." It makes for a cozy place to live and to be.
